ABSTRACT

Divorce among young couples, especially in Pringsewu, is often caused by economic problems. To prevent divorce caused by economic factors, it is important for families to implement transparent and accountable financial management. This can help with financial stability, meet needs, and reduce the risk of conflict. Apart from that, the Sandwich Generation phenomenon, where children feel they have to cover their parents' living costs, also often occurs in young families. Research on household financial management among young couples in St. Yusuf Pringsewu uses qualitative methods with a phenomenological approach. This research involved observation, interviews, documentation, and Nvivo software to collect data. The research results show that household accounting plays an important role in managing family finances. Research informants, namely young housewives, have applied the categories of budgeting, recording, decision making and long-term financial planning. However, some still experience difficulties in consistently recording their finances, especially due to income uncertainty.
